TROOP C'S GREAT WELCOME.

A CHEERING THROG FROM FULTON FERRY TO THE ARMOY.

AFFECTING SCENES WHEN THE HEADQUARTERS WERE REACHED—THE PROGRAMME UPSET BY THE EAGERNESS OF RELATIVES AND FRIENDS TO MEET CAPTAIN CLAYTON AND HIS MEN.

Troop C, the only soldiers from Brooklyn who saw actual service in the Spanish war, reached home yesterday and received the touching welcome of mothers and fathers, sweethearts and wives, and the hearty commendations of their fellow-citizens, and took part in a triumphal procession which provoked almost unparalleled enthusiasm from Fulton Ferry to the troops' armory, in North Portland-ave. The streets were lined with spectators all along the route, but it was at Port Greene Park and in North Portland-ave, leading to the armory, that the crowd was so dense that Troop C, which was leading the way, had to serve as a wedge to open a path for their comrades. Three mighty shouts went up from the crowd when the troops stopped in front of their old home in North Portland-ave. There were many friends there, and smiles of pleasure passed over the sun-burned faces of the troopers as they caught sight of acquaintances here and there, and knew that at last they were home again. As the and expressed them to their hearts' content. One little mother almost fainted when she saw her son, and he had to assist her to a seat in his arms, and the tears coursed down her cheeks as he tenderly bent over and kissed her.

Mrs. Clayton was waiting for her husband at the door to the reception-room. She strove to be calm and dignified, but it could be seen that she could hardly wait for the Captain to appear. In her arms she had little Bertram Tracy Clayton, Jr. Trooper after trooper came up the stairs, but the Captain seemed unwilling to leave until he had seen that his men were all right below. The younger Clayton grew impatient. Finally one of Troop C's men offered to take him to his father. They met at the head of the stairs, and the younger shouted with joy as he saw the familiar face again, and then he gave the soldier a bear hug that must have left a red mark on his neck. To Mrs. Clayton it had no matter at that minute that she was chairman of the Reception Committee, and that her official place was at the door. In a minute she had reached the head of the stairs, and mother and father and son were soon receiving the congratulations of their many friends. All this time the carefully prepared luncheon was waiting. No one seemed to think of eating, or if they did, they did not care, and it was only after coaxing by the young women who they finally got the troopers one by one away from their friends and into the gymnasium, where a dainty feast had been spread.

GENERAL McLEER SAYS A FEW WORDS.

There was a big rush of the enthusiastic spectators to follow the troopers into the dining-room, but the policemen drew the line there, and the soldiers were allowed to eat in peace. They did ample justice to the beautiful dinner. Just at the close of the feast General McLeer, who had been sitting at a small table in the center of the room, with Captain Smith, William Cullen Bryant, Captain Smith, of Troop C, Congressman Briggs, and Lieutenant Tuttle, arose and asked the privilege of doing the talking for a minute. General McLeer spoke eloquently and with deep feeling, comparing the scenes he had witnessed on the troops' march to the armory with those in which he took part after Lee had surrendered to Grant. Continuing, he said:

"I will not speak long, for it would be cruel for me to keep you from your loved ones, whose affectionate greetings are more eloquent than anything I could say. I would be recreant in my duty if I failed to pay tribute to the women whose untiring efforts have been devoted to all things that could add to your pleasure." (Prolonged cheering from the troopers.)

General McLeer then said that he had the greatest pleasure in presenting to Captain Clayton from Mrs. Langstaff a beautiful silk gown, which he was to keep as a souvenir and have inscribed with the word "Commo." He addressed himself to Captain Clayton, and then, in parenthesis, said "Major Clayton, it should be said that the troopers are not to be considered as cheer in honor of their captain. General McLeer closed by repeating his welcome to the troopers and thanking the Captain for the care he had taken of the boys. Three rousing cheers followed, and Captain Clayton arose to accept the guidon. He spoke most loyally of his soldiers and of their gallant work, and thanked the women, saying that if it had not been for their untiring attention he doubted if he would have been able to bring back all his men with him. Congressman Briggs spoke briefly. The troopers then gathered in a knot and tried to "Auld Lang Syne" and "Home, Sweet Home." They sang few of the words, but there was lots of feeling in their effort. The words of those times were apparently strange to most of them. This ceremony brought the celebration to an end, and the soldiers surrendered once more to the mothers and the girls.

INCIDENTS OF THE MARCH.

There were many interesting and suggestive incidents along the line of march. There is a large laboring population in North Portland-ave, on both sides of the armory. These people have seen the troopers so often that they have come to regard them as their particular command. The windows of these modest dwellings were crowded with brawny men in their shirtsleeves, who waved American flags and shouted their approvals.

There was a tremendous outpouring of baby carriages at Fort Greene Park, and hundreds of youngsters got perhaps their first lesson in patriotism. The marchers were greeted by the nurses who had placed flags in the hands of scores of babies, and when the troopers clattered by the flags waved triumphantly and the babies crowded a welcome that must have been drowned before it reached the ears of the troopers, but which sounded very sweet to the mothers and nurses closer at hand.

It was nearly 5 o'clock when the ferryboat Brooklyn, with the troopers on board, reached Fulton-st. The ship was loaded by the cheering of tugs and the ringing of bells and the mighty shouts of a dense throng that had assembled in the neighborhood of the ferryhouse. For two hours Captain Clayton and his men had hard work to keep the crowd away from the approach. Troop C was drawn up in line on the north side of the street, its fresh and unstained guidon fluttering in the breeze. The first thing that was noticed as the Brooklyn came into the slip was the rapid motion of Troop C. The ship was as little delay as possible. The members of the Citizens' Committee got into their carriages, and preceded by an escort of mounted police, drove up the street. Then Troop C wheeled into the slip, and the ship was an escort of honor to the returning soldiers. Shout after shout went up as the men rode off of the boat. They quickly formed, and the triumphal procession started on its way up Fulton-st. It was followed by the crowd, running and jumping, waving hats in the air and shouting itself hoarse. From Fulton-st. the line of march was borne Clinton to Schermerhorn, to Lafayette-ave., to Cumberland-st., and across the eastern border of Fort Greene Park to Myrtle-ave. When the men turned down into North Portland-ave, a detachment of the 3d Battalion of the 2d Regiment, in command of Lieutenant C. E. Laing, fired a salute of welcome as the men approached their armory. All along the line of march the streets were packed with people, and the troopers were kept busy answering salutations from friends who recognized them from the sidewalks.

THE TRIP HOME AND THE COMMO FIGHT.

Lieutenant Winthrop M. Tuttle, in speaking of the trip from Ponce, said that it could hardly be called pleasant in any other sense than that the ship was homeward bound. The men had a trifle more roomy and cleaner quarters than on the Massachusetts, in which they went to Porto Rico, but the officers' quarters were more crowded, and they had to divide into several rooms in order to get into their mess-room. He said that the men were all in fair condition, but that the provision for medical attendance and supplies in Porto Rico was not all that it might have been.

Ex-Assistant Corporation Counsel Frank Angell told of the work of Troop C at the skirmish of Alibonito Pass, and the subsequent battle of Commo. In spite of the fact that Commo has gone down in history as a battle, he said that it was not much more than a skirmish, and that the real fighting had been done by Troop C from early in the morning to late in the afternoon at Alibonito Pass.

The Spanish forces were strongly entrenched on the hill, with batteries which had been taken from the gunboats at San Juan. Trooper Angell said that the enemy's range was correctly estimated, but that something was wrong with the shell fuses, as the shells did not explode until they had passed over the men. "It is the general belief," he said, "among the men of our troop that we saved the entire attacking force of the Americans from being routed. This was done by a bold sortie which Troop C made, leading the Spaniards to believe that an entire regiment of cavalry was behind them. Thrown into a panic, the Spaniards retreated. Every man in Troop C seemed eager for work, and the firing and dash of their little expedition could not be explained by the Spaniards except through the belief that they were the outposts of a large and overwhelming force."

GREETINGS THROUGH THE MEGAPHONE.

Just after the Mississippi cleared Quarantine, she was greeted by the tug President, whose passengers were relatives and friends of the returning troopers. As soon as the soldiers recognized their friends there was an interchange of enthusiastic cheers, which gladdened the hearts of every one. The men of Troop C were bunched together, and at first were hard to distinguish because of their rugged appearance and their

A Monday of Autumn Suggestions.

The harvest is near, the granaries are filling, the orchards are fast ripening, the apples thump the ground and strew the grass with plenty; and as nature befriends us with her rich yield, so this store invites you to a harvest of newness in its opening of Fall Merchandise. Months of our seed sowing in the great market fields of the world, now bring unequalled newness and fashion from over the seas, while our own country almost surfeits every department with the most stylish, serviceable, best and exclusive goods of the season. To bespeak the quality and genuineness of our merchandise in the way of comparison with inferior goods, often advertised elsewhere, may seem superfluous to you who know the character of this store. But at the beginning of our great Autumn Merchandising Movement which portends for you more than ever before, we sound a note of warning. Be sure you get the Maximum of quality at the minimum of price, rather than goods cheapened in quality to meet the prices created by experienced buying. Why this store sells goods in many cases cheaper, and always as cheap as elsewhere, is because of these superior facilities; because of closer touch with the markets of the world. We never reduce quality when we reduce price, or sell seconds or imperfect goods without a plain statement of the fact. Nor do we ever exaggerate values. Price and quality inducements are not confined to one day, but are to be had here every hour of every day in the week. As for to-morrow it would take chapters to tell of the new Autumn Costumes, Capes and Wraps, Silks, Dress Goods, Undergarments, treasures of quality and exclusiveness. Goods that can't lose their individuality; prices that are beyond competition and imitation.

bronzed skin, unshaven faces and weather-beaten uniforms. The President considered that it had the right of way among all the craft around the Mississippi, and insisted on getting as near as possible to the big transport. Captain Brandon used the megaphone in greeting the ship, and received back in like manner the pleasing response:

"All well on board."

Captain Clayton was soon seen standing in front of his men. As soon as he was noticed William Cullen Bryant, who has two sons in the troop, grabbed the megaphone and shouted:

"We're glad to see you. How are you all?"

"Almost in a chorus the men shouted back:

"Bully! Not a man down. Only two seasick!"

Mr. Bryant told the captain of the arrangements made for their reception in Brooklyn, and added that there would be plenty to eat, and with that Mr. Bryant and his party were greeted with the heartiest cheer they ever expected to hear. A cruel joker incurred the displeasure of the crowd on the President by shouting out to the cavalrymen that they were to be sent to Camp Black. This startling information, which the men had no reason to disbelieve, drew forth a mighty groan of disgust, but when some one else shouted out, "That's all nonsense; you're going to stay at home," the troopers gave another of their famous cheers.

The ferryboat Brooklyn was placed at the disposal of the Citizens' Committee for the day. It stood at the Atlantic ferry for some time waiting for its passengers, and for news of the Mississippi. The members of the party had hoped to enjoy a trip down the bay on the ferryboat, but, much to their disgust, they were informed by the captain that the boat could not take such a long trip, and the best they could take was to wait and go to Jersey City, where the boat was waiting in the slip. Senator Brush surprised the people on board by raising upon one of the flagpoles of the boat the old city flag of Brooklyn. Many other flags and decorations had been placed on the boat by the ferry company.

The Brooklyn's party sighted the Mississippi about noon, and set out immediately for Pier K, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in Jersey City. When there they had an excellent opportunity to see the troopers land. The first man to leave the boat was Sergeant John S. Fiske, recognized relative on the pier, he directed, quickly gathered together and jumped to the pier, almost tumbling into the arms of his brother and other loved ones who had gone there to meet him. The Brooklyn troopers were at the rear of the boat, and their Brooklyn friends quickly gathered below them, and carried on a running fire of conversation. Captain Clayton reported that the health of his command was excellent, but that William V. Marx, John A. Mularky, Howard Armstrong, Edward J. Byrne and Francis W. Richardson were suffering from malarial fever.

Ninety-two members of the troop were on the Mississippi.

SOLDIERS IN LONG ISLAND CITY.

A NEW WARD READY AT ST. JOHN'S—WORK OF THE RED CROSS HOSPITAL.

Sister Mary David, who is at the head of St. John's Hospital, at Long Island City, announced yesterday that the new ward in the hospital was ready, and that sixty soldiers could be accommodated. Mrs. Marquardt, the treasurer of the Red Cross, out of her own personal means, put sixty cots in the ward. The ward has been decorated with bunting and made as cheerful-looking as possible. Mrs. Hammond, who is in charge of the Red Cross Hospital at Long Island City, yesterday received a letter from Grace N. Dodge, of Irvington, informing her that the writer had accommodations for six sick soldiers and would provide nurses for them. The Red Cross Hospital was established a week ago Tuesday. Since that time it has furnished beds and medicine for 3,500 soldiers, fed 530 more, and furnished transportation to their homes for 1,000 more soldiers.

DEATH OF SERGEANT ZEIGNER.

First Sergeant Herman Zeigner, of Company E, 1st New-York Volunteers, died on Friday night in St. John's Hospital, Long Island City. He went through the campaign in Cuba and contracted fever. When he got out of the detention hospital in Montauk he went to his home, No. 86 Seventh-st. On Thursday his condition became so bad that he had to be sent to the hospital, and, notwithstanding had to be sent to the hospital, he continued to sink until his death. He was thirty-eight years old and his wife was in destitute circumstances until the Red Cross heard of her case and gave her $100. Zeigner was a former Regular Army man. He served for eight years with the 7th United States Cavalry, and received a medal for bravery in Cuba, or his conduct in the battle of Wounded Knee, which occurred in the Sioux War. His funeral will take place this afternoon.
